Alaska state police accident reports

Car accidents happen, even for the most careful drivers. Although you can't always avoid bumper benders, you can educate yourself about your legal obligations after an accident. If you're wondering what action to take after a car accident, read on to learn more about filing a car accident report in Alaska. Your obligation to report If you are involved in a traffic accident in Alaska, you may have an obligation to report the accident to the police, send a written report to the Alaska Motor Vehicle Division, or both. If the accident was investigated by police, police have their own independent obligation to generate a report within 24 hours of the incident. There are heavy penalties for not making a necessary report after an accident. Failure to comply may result in the suspension of state driving privileges until you report. According to Alaska law, not making a report is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of up to $200, imprisonment for 90 days, or both. There is also a strong motivation to be careful and accurate in any report you make. Giving false information in a car accident report is punishable by a fine of up to $1,000 imprisonment of up to a year, or both. Alaska Car Accident Report Basics at a Glance The following graphic provides more information about filing a car accident report in Alaska. Alaska Statutes Sections 28.35.080, 28.35.090 and 28.35.110 When reporting a car accident should be reported if it results in: The bodily injury or death of any person (including a driver, passenger, or pedestrian/bystander.) Total property damage to an apparent extent of $2,000 or more If a reportable accident has not been investigated by police, the driver must also submit a written accident report A report is not required of someone physically unable to make the report due to the inability to report whether the accident occurred within a municipality, a driver must report the accident to the local police department If an accident occurred in a rural area not included in a municipality, the driver must report the accident to the Department of Public Safety The accident should be reported immediately by the fastest media If a written report is required, must be submitted to the Alaska Motor Vehicle Division within 10 days of the accident Note: State laws are always subject to change by passing new legislation, decisions in higher courts (including federal decisions), voting initiatives, and other means.
